This course introduces Chinese Division students to a number of the key conventions of English-language academic texts in the field of Chinese studies, through a focus on the structure and language features of critiques, review papers and academic reports. Students will read research articles about various aspects of Chinese studies and analyse these in order to critically evaluate ideas and evidence before they develop their own arguments. The course is designed specifically for the needs of NTU students, and many of the texts and study topics have a Singapore focus.

LEARNING OBJECTIVE

The objectives of this second level course is to equip Chinese Division students with the necessary skills for gathering and reviewing credible academic sources, and writing up a critique and a review paper by:

1. reading and responding to academic texts in Chinese studies;
2. gathering, evaluating and citing relevant academic sources;
3. critiquing and reviewing academic sources; and
4. presenting a short review paper on Chinese studies.

LEARNING OUTCOMES

Upon successful completion of the course, the students should be able to:

1. critically evaluate relevant sources;
2. identify the features and structure of journal articles;
3. write a critique of a journal article;
4. write a short review paper; and
5. present a short review paper.
